Waiting For The Deer

One draws closer and I can hear the softness, the undulating of its breath-

Others thrum across the fringing of leaves, winding and unwinding the paths worn by the horses-

The air grows thick with their exhalations and the mumbling of their halved hooves and then-

I’m at the edge of the woods amidst the young pines and the bloodroot, the honeysuckle blossoms-

Remembering only that I’ve forgotten- I think of your touch, like gossamer, and the other places I might never again visit.
Turning The Earth With Our Hands We Uncovered Bits Of Bone

We bought a twenty acre hay field and on the first cutting built a horse farm, strung steel wire between the fence-posts, watched them haul the house in on wide-load trucks.

It didn’t feel like long before there were cobwebs latticing the rafters of the barn, ants trailing to the pantry, the bench on the grave of my mother’s mare arriving and then thinning with dry-rot.

We laid coins on the lip of the train tracks bordering the property and forgot them, flattened among the thickets of alfalfa and the broad trunks of trees.

When I’m falling asleep 100 miles away I know the train is there, quickening across the horizon, the tree-limbs fracturing that light-polluted stretch of sky. It grows lighter still.
The Harvest

We loosened dense pockets of earth, turning bleached bones settled in the soil. Then the planting, pressing seed and fence-post and the cinderblock foundation of the house into the warm dark. There was growth, fractured limbs on the brush-heap, the distance of my father. My mother nurtured the pastures, culling the pokeweed, the purple loosestrife, filling groundhog holes grown threatening. Autumn brought an empty yield, headless field mice left by the barn cats, vacant chair atop the long neck of the kitchen table. We waited for the solstice, rotation of the fields for a new season, our discourse with change perennial.
Fears Concerning My Mother’s Eventual Death grasping the reduction of body, her body, housed in cedar box, in bronze drum, in locket caught at my throat the scattering of her, sowing, soft places in myself knotting, her weight unraveling from my hands

Thinning

water in cupped hands:
dream where I find her, my mare, felled in the street bleeding fast, the scent of warm metal, I can do nothing but take her head in my lap and clench her mane and watch as she flickers out of her eyes and all the while she’s growing smaller and smaller until she is no bigger than a foal and then I gather her in my arms, carry her back to the barn

I remember what it meant to be innocent, I know what happens to the stones in the riverbed, to the oak of your front door The Flood

the waters took the town, set the whole of it adrift, we let it dazzle us after the first days of rain the world was verdant we could think only of softness, seeing the breadth of the river, tireless current there are veils of silt atop hardwood floors, heirloom carafes brimmed with darkened water as though there’s translation to be unearthed in the wreckage, I am gathering books still swollen in their shelves Hunting Season

I need more to sustain me than the muscled casing of bones. One of the things my father taught my brother was how to shoot a rifle—how to be alert, how to jail the animal in the crosshairs, how to exhale before you pull the trigger, how if you turn your eyes for a moment, just like that, you’ve lost your shot. He said he could teach me too, but I’ve learned from him in different ways, I couldn’t imagine slicing into anything’s belly that way, discarding its warm, newly-stilled heart.
Bloodline

My brother looks older with his helmet dipped over his brow, a microphone clipped to his workshirt.
I imagine his shoulders, broad like our father’s, bearing the weight of a fire axe.

He shows me his hands, soot worked under the fingernails.
I think of those hands slicking icing off pieces of chocolate cake, digging holes in the gravel driveway.

When I ask him, he tells me the worst of it: a chasm that was once a man’s face, how he had to grope through the pants-pockets to fish out a driver’s license.

I see our mother’s softness in his chestnut eyes when he tells me about the small morgue, the wall of drawers.

I don’t tell him that when we were children my worst fear was the he would die.

I don’t ask him why he does it or why he drives too fast.
Our parents met firefighting.
I know it has less to do with extinguishing flame and more to do with running into a building on fire.
For My Father

Do you remember crying, picking gravel stones out of my tattered knee with a pair of tweezers do you consider my eyes, reflections of yours, the way I wander with you and my mother joined still in the sequencing of my makeup do you see her, your sister, when you look at me, face buried in a book. do you think of your mother living alone in the house where she raised you, next door to the vacant house of her mother, doilies growing yellow on the dining room table, cutlery stacked in the drawers what is it you think when you think of loss, or is the past to you a folded quilt, the pattern obscured do you think of the call from your mother, the sound that opened from within you, nothing like my mother has heard, when she said they’d found her, your sister, some man’s garage, a garden hose and then a funeral are your hands older than you remember, do they sift the waters for something to seize
Of Witness

the hay fields are ancient, empty of stories, boxes of roots

ey they reach down toward the dark, toward stillness someone once said that memory is a shoreless water that there is nothing new under the sun

t here is something to be said of these empty hands, this old growth how the land will outlast us
